EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

- The Sunday Mail Adelaide (page 1) reports 7 of 100 SA Health staff investigated for accessing patient records without authority have had their employment terminated since a zero tolerance policy was instated for the practice in 2015, with an investigation into a further 18 staff over the access of Charlie Steven's records expected to be completed in December.
- The Sunday Herald Sun (page 4) reports that the Victorian Alcohol and Drug Association has found 4615 people in Victoria were on daily waitlists for treatment during June and July this year, with demand for treatment almost doubling since the pandemic according to AIHW data.
- The Sunday Mail Brisbane (page 4) reports the Queensland Opposition Leader David Crisafulli has pledged to exempt GPs from payroll tax if elected, with AMAQ president Dr Nick Yim supporting the move, saying patients would save up to $30 per GP visit, calling on Labor to make the same pledge.
- Sunday Mail Brisbane (page 5) reports the Australia's Mother and Babies Report from AIHW has revealed roadside births in Queensland are above the national average, with the Rural Doctors Association of Queensland calling for increased and restored birthing services across regional Queensland.

- The Sun Herald (page 6) reports Health Minister Mark Butler has defended a proposed ban on social media for children as mental health advocacy groups say a tax on social media platforms to fund mental health access would be more effective. "We've seen an alarming increase in levels of mental distress among young people, not just here in Australia, but around the world for the last 20 years ... The explosion in social media is one of the drivers behind this increase in distress", Mr Butler said. Also reported by: Sunday Age
- ABC Online reports Chronic Pain Australia has called for increased paediatric pain clinics as one in five children in Australia currently suffers from chronic pain and advocates say a lack of chronic pain-specific services means long wait times, affecting children's health and school participation. A spokesperson for Health Minister Mark Butler said the government has committed to funding multidisciplinary care through primary health networks and is developing a national strategy for engaging with organisations focused on chronic pain in children.
- ABC Online reports pregnant women in Queensland will be able to access free testing for rhesus D haemolytic disease in an Australian first, with doctors saying the tests will save approximately 7000 doses of treatment a year, as all pregnant women are currently administered treatment without testing or diagnosis occurring.

Experts urge tax to fund treatment of mental illness

Mental health advocates say the federal government is failing young people by pushing social media bans instead of improving access to unaffordable psychology services, calling for a levy on social media companies to subsidise the sector. [...] Asked about the organisations' concerns, federal Health Minister Mark Butler defended the ban.

Australians are paying around 3% more for health insurance this year, but the 12 million people with private hospital cover are also facing higher out-of-pocket costs. A recent survey has found around 50% of respondents who had private health cover were shopping around or making sacrifices to afford it. Health Minister Mark Butler says the private sector including insurers and specialists need to do more to protect patients with exorbitant bills.
